Alaskan game refuge added to national park system Posted: Tuesday, April 16, 2001 ANCHORAGE (AP) -- A small refuge in southeastern Alaska is being added to the national park system, a move welcomed by local residents who are worried about poaching and bear attacks. The U.S. Park Service said it is adding a small subset of Devil Island, a 17-square-mile island along the Aleutian chain. Previously the island was part of the Alaska Maritime National Wildlife Refuge, but in 2001 that island was turned over to the federal government. Donald Simpson, manager of the 15-acre refuge, was quick to point out that it is not considered a "real" park. "It's kind of like the opposite of a national park," Simpson said. "You're not allowed to go there. It's to preserve the wildlife." The original Devil Island was named for pirate vessels that used it as a base in the 1700s. In the 1940s, it became a refuge for fur seals and was largely closed to hunting by the state and federal government. The refuge would be open to the public for on-island activities like hunting and fishing, but Simpson said he considers it to be a very small part of the island. It would contain three small, gradually ascending trails, a small cluster of old buildings and some land that is apparently accessible only by boat. In addition to wildlife, the refuge is also home to numerous birds and other animals, like muskoxen, caribou, foxes and mink. The island offers a chance for year-round residents to experience a mountainous temperate rainforest, Simpson said. "It's definitely wild and dramatic," he said. There are an estimated 4,

New Air Marke Teams wear business clothes rather than tracksuits Tracksuit fashion is a recurring theme for this season's F1, with a minority of drivers – the “generalists” – adopting the suit in preference to the current fashion for loose-fitting shorts and T-shirts. But even the suits were on show in Barcelona last month, with some teams showing off business attire for the first time at a sport that has historically had a reputation for more casual dress. The drivers were obviously disappointed with their efforts, but believe they achieved their goal of shaking off a perceived association with gangsta rappers and grime. “There was a focus group talking about what people think about the sport, and people kept coming back to that. They don't know what to think about me: are you a gangster? Are you a drug dealer? So we felt like it was important to kind of give the wrong impression,” said Pastor Maldonado. “I tried wearing a T-shirt, shorts, trainers and a jacket. I did not look like a gangster,” added Jean-Eric Vergne. In the short term, it was easy to spot the drivers with tracksuits, or conspicuously dressed as that. What was more difficult to spot is the sportswear itself, which looks less garish and outlandish, with a darker palette and less of an emphasis on colour. “I do not want to look like a kid in a candy store,” said Vergne. “I do not want to look like I am in a toy store. I want to look
